HSA members encouraged to identify key issues for health science professionals

December 14, 2010

The Association of Canadian Community Colleges (ACCC) is conducting a national study to identify issues of concern to health science professionals trained at community colleges. One of the goals of the project, which has been funded by Health Canada, is to develop policy recommendations on how best to address recruitment and retention issues for these health science professions.

The Association is seeking input from health science professionals, policy makers, educators, regulators, and students to help them identify the most important areas of policy focus, and assist in prioritizing strategies and actions that could be taken to address these areas.

Please go to www.academicagroup.ca/surveys/NAHPS to respond to the anonymous survey and participate in this important study.

The survey is being conducted by Academica Group, a research firm contracted by the ACCC. Your participation in the survey is completely voluntary and confidential. The survey is available online until midnight on Friday, December 31, 2010, and should require about 10-15 minutes of your time.

Please contact surveys@academicagroup.com for technical difficulties.

We encourage you to forward this information to others who may be interested in participating in this important study!
